God has called us all to live missional lives. And He has given each of us unique passions and talents to help us on mission. In Argentina, Franco Mazzocca proved that through his creative use of a talent that might not seem missional at first glance: 3D printing. Franco built his first 3D printer out of spare parts, but with time, he improved the machine. God gradually brought a team of people with similar interests around him, but not just for the sake of a hobby. No, they saw their passions as an avenue to answer a need in the world.

The City Christian Community project (C3D) creates 3D-printed prosthetics for people in a country where prosthetics are difficult to come by. They’re expensive and don’t often work the way they should. They’re an impractical solution. C3D seeks to empower those in their community who are often left behind by offering a different solution. They print individualized prosthetics and give them away, free of charge!

WGM global worker Vince Archer connected with Franco through a men’s group at their church, and when he heard about the ministry, he looked for ways to get involved, including bringing back materials and needed resources from the United States. God continued to expand the network of C3D, bringing people and resources to help the ministry succeed and grow its reach.

More important than physical needs, though, are the spiritual ones God is using C3D to meet. Through a partnership with the local church, the team started holding special events to deliver the prosthetics and celebrate with the recipients, their friends, and their families. This event provides an opportunity to share the Gospel and meet a spiritual need that goes much deeper than the need for a prosthetic. “We want this to be a really happy day,” Franco says about the event. “But what could be a happier day than getting to hear the salvation message?”

What began as one man’s hobby has become a ministry where many people can come together and use what they are passionate about to serve others and grow the kingdom. Isn’t this God’s desire for His people? That they would find that place where their passions intersect His heart for the world? Here at WGM, we love to equip those like Vince and Franco. And we’re glad to hear Franco affirm, “God called me to do these things for people. God used everything I know and everything I love.”
